Mars has always captured the imagination of people. Questions about Martian life began when early astronomers thought the planet was much like our planet Earth. Later observers of the night sky imagined they saw canals and vegetation in their telescopes. Scientists have attempted to look for signs of past life, especially where water once flowed. Their instruments discovered ice, and their studies delved into rocks on Mars. Since microscopic life forms exist in Earth's most extreme regions, microorganisms might also exist on Mars. The planet has "hot spots" that might be geothermal vents. These, some scientists say, may be among the best places to _____.

The physiological and mental stress encountered by airplane travelers when crossing four or more time zones is commonly called jet lag. Patterns of hunger, sleep, and elimination, along with alertness, memory, and normal judgement, may all be affected. More than 100 biological functions that fluctuate during the 24-hour cycle (circadian rhythm) can become desynchronized. Most people's bodies adjust at a rate of about one hour per day. Thus after four time zone changes, the body will require about four days to _____. Flying eastward is often more difficult than flying westward, which adds hours to the day.

Owners who do not train their dogs in the basics of good behavior are irresponsible: badly behaved dogs should not be blamed for any mayhem that they may cause – it is the fault of their owners. British legislation reflects this, and dog-owners are obliged to _____. The 1991 Dangerous Dogs Act states that it is a criminal offense to allow your dog to be out of control in a public place, including your automobile and if anyone feels threatened by your dog, they are within their rights to report you, as its owner, to the police. If you are found guilty under this act, your dog could be destroyed, and you could even receive a prison sentence.

Much of the craving for meat and the excitement it generates reflects the unique nutritional benefits that preindustrial populations derive from consuming a food that often contains both high-quality protein and lots of fat in one concentrated package. The first priority of a hungry person's body is to convert whatever food it consumes into energy. Supplied with nothing but lean meat, the body uses the protein in it for energy rather than for body-building and body-regulating functions. One way to "spare" the protein in meat is _____, a practice followed around the world, as in "steak and potatoes," "spaghetti and meat balls," "pork and dumplings" and "chicken and rice."
